第一节

Dear Mr. David,

I am Li Hua from the International Department. I registered for the “Cross-Cultural Communication Summer Camp” last week, but I haven’t received a confirmation yet. I was wondering if you could help check my application status.

Additionally, could you please inform me of the upcoming arrangements, such as the detailed schedule and required materials for the camp?

I’m really looking forward to participating in this meaningful activity. Thank you for your time and assistance.

Yours,

Li Hua

第二节

As my conscience was tearing me apart, I knew I couldn’t let this continue. I gathered my courage and walked to Mark’s door with a small pot of flowers I had bought from a nearby store. When he opened it, his expression was neutral, neither angry nor welcoming. “Mark, I’m so sorry,” I said, my voice trembling slightly. “I was careless with the hose, and I ruined your garden. I should have been more responsible. I know flowers can’t replace what you lost, but I hope you can forgive me.” Mark stood there, looking at me for a long moment without saying a word. But his face softened.

As I turned to leave, he called out, “Hey, wait.” He disappeared inside and returned with a small box in his hands—salted caramel candies, the same ones he always brought back. “I know you’ve been busy with work,” he said gently. “I was upset about the garden, but it’s just flowers. Our friendship means much more.” Overwhelmed by his kindness, I felt tears welling up as I accepted the box. “Thank you, Mark,” I managed to say. “I’ll help you rebuild the garden this weekend.” He smiled and nodded, and I knew the distance between us had finally melted away.
