Possible answer:

If what we want seems out of reach, should we keep trying or set another goal? To me, knowing when to keep trying is just as important as knowing when to adjust our goals.

Last year, I tried out for an English speech contest but failed. Disappointed, I kept working on my spoken English. Later, I learned that the event was in need of English-speaking volunteers. Skilled at communication and quick-minded, I applied to be a volunteer and got the chance.

Just as I was about to check the last tiny hidden puddle, a weak response drifted through the quiet air. My heart raced instantly. I rushed toward the voice and spotted a trembling figure sitting by the puddle, injured and exhausted. I rushed toward her. "Are you Laura?" I asked breathlessly.

Waiting patiently with her, I shared water and food to help her regain strength. Soon the rescue team arrived. Watching Laura being safely escorted out of the mountains, I finally felt relieved. It struck me after the rescue that my deep knowledge of these wild mountains serves more than just my hobby — it can be a lifesaver.
